Sustainability challenges blur the boundaries between academic disciplines, between research, policy and practice, and between states, markets and society. What do exemplary scientists and organisations do to bridge the gaps between these groups and help their research to make the greatest impact? How do they do it? And how can their best practices be adapted for a diverse range of specific sustainability challenges? Enhancing Science Impact: Bridging Research, Policy and Practice for Sustainability addresses these questions in an accessible and engaging way. It provides principles explaining how research programs can work more effectively across the boundaries between science, society and decision-making by building social and institutional networks. The book suggests useful ways of thinking about a diverse range of problems and then offers five approaches to help embed science in sustainability governance. It will be an indispensable guide for researcher leaders, science program managers and science policy advisers interested in ensuring that applied research can meaningfully contribute to sustainability outcomes.

Everyone has a story to tell! Some are exciting, some are mundane. Some are new and others are old. If the story is told in a way that readers can relate to, it becomes difficult to put down. This book entails a number of stories and articles written to entertain and, in many cases, to educate the reader about the world we live in and how to achieve success in it. Some are true, some are not. But each is constructed in such a way that it will force the reader to consider a different way of looking at life and the world. As a friend of mine said, "This really is an enthralling collection of short stories with a variety of topics including a fantastical tale of a 19th-century robber and a little boy who runs away from home and eventually returns after nearly freezing to death. This collection covers a wide range of emotion. Readers will find themselves turning page after page without a stop of this charming collection."
